A PREPARE FOR THE WORST Now comes the end.
For nearly a year, my life has been focused on the next project, the next big thing, the next story to finally tell — the next, and then the next, and the next, and the next. And there was never a way to prepare yourself for the end. But in a sense, you already know what it feels like when the book ends. You feel a sense of panic, a feeling that things will never be the same, that the project is done, and you're still searching for a way to start again. For some, the end may come quickly. Others, the book stretches out for months, or even years. But whatever the length of time, once the word "publishing" is struck off the project, it will be over. And so it has been for me. There was a long period during which my book would be in constant motion, as I turned first to the here and now, trying to make a living, then moving out of that pursuit and trying to figure out the next project. The here and now became a lot harder to make. How do you, or could you, make a living, when most of the audience is used to seeing whatever you're making for them every week or every other week, a weekly series is ubiquitous in almost every genre? So the here and now became a challenge. For years, one of my projects was a series of how-to-do-things books that, by any objective standard, were incredibly popular. But by the time they ended, the here and now was completely unfamiliar territory. My hands weren't sure of anything they were touching. The audience was familiar with me as a writer, so the revenue model didn't make sense to them. And they'd say, "So I keep watching you," even as I began to watch other series. So I struggled. Finally, though, the here and now became a struggle as well. And I wanted to know how to get out of that as quickly as possible. The metaphor is sometimes a boxer who's been in the ring a long time, and he's just trying to get back in. When the bell rings, he's happy. But he has all these memories of the day before. Suddenly, he looks at the clock, and it
